Plan. If approved, this would allow more time for towns and most importantly, its residents, to review and evaluate how the plan will affect their property and suggest changes.

Our argument is the final Plan review process was only 30 days to review a complicated 416-page document which includes maps and charts. Small towns are at a disadvantage to comply with such a fast turn-around because we have civilian representatives that meet once or twice per month, not to mention that many have full-time jobs. It also did not provide time to gather input from its citizenry. Larger towns and cities have paid, sometimes full-time staff to do this work. The process is unfair to small towns and communities and violates the Regional Plan's Environmental Justice Policy.
